Hello Larry, Yes. Cars, buildings and fast food joints contain less water than living trees.

\(https://www.britannica.com/science/wood-plant-tissue/Hygroscopicity\).

"The "green" wood in living trees contains large amounts of water. The moisture content of wood is expressed as a percentage of the dry wood weight. The green moisture content of wood is normally above 60 percent, and can range as high as 120 percent for some species." This is precisely the scientific reason that cars, buildings and fast food joints burn first and burn at lower temperatures than living trees (No direct contact with flames is needed to burn them, because they are more flammable than living trees). Indeed, all cars contain up to twenty gallons of a fire accelerant called "gasoline" which is flammable (and explosive) at lower temperatures than living trees. Likewise, many homes and fast food joints contain a fire accelerant called "propane" and/or "natural gas" which they use for heating and for cooking. Indeed, most fast food joints also contain hundreds of gallons of an fire accelerant called "cooking oil" which they use for frying foods. So, no high tech, directed energy weapons are needed to to create the fire damage about
